

ONESOURCE Global Duty Optimisation

For companies dealing in international trade, compliance is only one piece of the puzzle.

In the past, global trade management (GTM) began when the shipment was ready. It meant moving the shipment from origin to destination at a low cost and in a timely, compliant manner. And although the importance of compliance cannot be understated — without it, trading privileges are lost, and the supply chain comes to a halt — compliance isn't the only benchmark for GTM today.

Best-in-class companies are now shifting focus to become more proactive and cost-efficient in their GTM strategy. Duty suspension programs exist all over the world, and by leveraging these programs, you can reduce, defer, or eliminate duty payments. The savings can add up to millions in the span of a year. And with many programs, you will experience various customs and supply chain benefits as well.

With so many reasons to participate in duty suspension programs, it begs the question — why doesn't everyone participate? Complying with duty savings opportunities (such as free trade agreements and regional customs regimes) can be administratively burdensome. Due to time, information availability, and labor constraints, companies often choose not to claim preferential status and therefore lose out on duty savings.
